Project Overview

Through strategic partnerships and innovative programming, NextGen Policy will run a program to serve the Sacramento County region's underserved, low-income communities with a focus on opportunity young adults (OYAs) -- bridging gaps and empowering young adults to access sustainable employment pathways, promoting economic resilience and prosperity in the region. The program will specifically focus on serving formerly incarcerated individuals within the Sacramento County region who are reentering society after completing their sentences.

Formerly incarcerated individuals often face systemic barriers that hinder their ability to secure stable employment, housing, and support services upon release. Discrimination in the job market, limited access to education and vocational training programs, and challenges accessing social services contribute to high rates of recidivism among this population. Additionally, the lack of coordination between correctional facilities and community-based organizations exacerbates the reentry process, making it difficult for individuals to access the resources and support they need to successfully reintegrate into society.

The project aims to address these challenges by providing wraparound services tailored to the unique needs of formerly incarcerated individuals, and ensure all efforts are culturally competent and inclusive. By implementing targeted workforce development programs, apprenticeships, and vocational training initiatives tailored to the needs of the public sector and manufacturing industries, NextGen Policy and partners can bridge the skills gap, create pathways to employment, and support economic growth in Sacramento County.

Moreover, fostering partnerships between employers and training providers will facilitate the development of industry-relevant curriculum, hands-on training opportunities, and career advancement pathways, ultimately strengthening the workforce and positioning Sacramento County as a hub for public sector and manufacturing excellence.
